

Environmental Health

Dedicated to the advancement of the environmental health professional

Volume 71, No. 10 June 2009

About the Cover:

Autism has generated some controversy recently because its origins are not well understood, so allegations that vaccines may be responsible for the increase in the prevalence of autism have gained traction. Is autism caused by genetics, the environment, or both? This month's installment of Inside the Profession examines the debate about this disease and Rebecca Berg explores the various sides of this complex issue—with the help of two autism researchers—including the genetic component and possible environmental triggers.
